This memorial painting was created in honour of Ryan Wolff, whose life and memory continue to be deeply meaningful to those who loved him. It reflects the quiet weight of carrying many faces we create while trying to protect the light others expect to see. It is for those who look inward and see a void... a reminder that this experience is shared, common, and worthy of care, love, and understanding. May it offer a space for honest conversation around mental health, and help shed light that nourishes our collective inner child.

Thank you for helping honour Ryan's life and for supporting compassionate, accessible mental health care for those who need it.

Here's to learning how to see our glow in the darkness, and to allowing even our broken pieces to become part of the beautiful whole that is our soul's journey.

The artist, Ticky Ty, devoted over 60 hours to this piece, carefully layering intention, symbolism, and care into every detail.

The artwork draws inspiration from Kintsugi, the Japanese art philosophy of repairing broken pottery with gold—embracing cracks rather than hiding them, and recognizing beauty in what has been broken and made whole again. The painting also glows in the dark, symbolizing light that endures, even in moments of deep darkness.
